tration camp as quickly as possible following the example of Auschwitz." And to the Minister of Economics: "May I be allowed to point out that the efforts of my office in such matters as the procurement of foreign labor within the restrictions set on the initiative of the individual employed by the Plenipotentiary General for the Provision of Manpower, and the employment of certain classes of manpower (prisoners of war, inmates of concentration camps, units of the Military Pioneer Corps, etc.) have had an effect upon the speed of progress of chemical production and upon that production itself, which must not be underestimated, I consider that the initiative of my staff in the procurement of labor, a virtue which has *

~~When the question of employment of foreign workers became acute, I decided to send representatives of my office to the countries concerned. First of all, for them to speak to the employers to see whether they would be ready to have their workers come to Germany. The gentlemen returned and reported to me that in the various countries abroad they had found full agreement with this plan by the employers. I then negotiated with the plants and pointed out this suggestion to them. The factories then concluded agreements and contracts with the firms for definite types of construction, installations and other work, and the foreign employers signed these contracts and then came with their staffs of workers to the various construction sites.~~

Why did you not refuse to do this after you had stated that, from your own inner sentiment, you were not in agreement with the drafting of men for work?

I believe the reasons for that were that the country was at war. Millions of its sons were fighting at the front, just as those of other countries. They died there, the dead for the Fatherland. It is certain that I might have evaded my duty. I might have fled to Switzerland, perhaps, and gotten into a safe place. But I had to take into account
