

curiosity he looked over petitioners' shoulders as they filled out papers, but the Consul confirmed that Haeffliger had long been the leader of an expatriate Swiss colony there. His insistence that he was Swiss was his only emphatic association in an otherwise mournful recital of how he and his family had been uprooted by the coming of the American Army. He seemed the most pitiable ^{KIND} ~~lived~~ of DP, the sensitive, intolligent soul who had never really had a country, a home or an occupation. He had been on the Farben board, but, he sighed, ^{after} /the war came there wasn't much for an international interpreter to do. He would have been a lonely expatriate in Frankfurt had it not been for his wife and family, and the friendship of people outside I.G. Farben.

In the case of France, I can recall that from a certain time on, there was some sort of labor conscription according to the pattern promulgated by the Vichy Government. One time - - I believe it was 1943 - - two young French pharmacology students from Lyon called on me at my home in Frankfurt and handed me a letter of recommendation from one of my French friends in which it was asked that I should help them to get a good job. I was able to place them in a leading pharmacy in Frankfurt. I later saw them a few times. They went on leave in 1944, and they did not come back. They had been quite satisfied with the work; the owner told me they didn't want to expose themselves to the dangers of the air raids anymore, and I could hardly blame them. These young people did not tell me that they came to Germany on a compulsory basis. There were some Dutch construction workers, too, who came to repair some bomb damage to my house in 1944. They used to sing at their work. Those were my little personal impressions that I had of foreign workers, and I never thought of compulsion.

Still, he may have been deceived. He had thought for some time that his colleagues kept things from him. Shortly after the war began he moved to Berlin, where he had a second residence, because he had
