

von Schnitzler had brought him to Berlin in the first place, and with both ~~von Schnitzler~~ and Schmitz silent, and Ilgner placed after him in the dock, he must represent the new Commercial Committee to the court. P "The overall responsibility was assumed by Dr. von Schnitzler. To the outside world, I was apparently his deputy, but that was a fiction. I represented Dr. von Schnitzler only in his absence, but even this never actually came about until the end of the war. I myself reported only occasionally about affairs and odd-jobs Dr. von Schnitzler assigned me."

Who was the real Haeffliger: a self-pitying weakling who must throw off his former power on the others, or a pawn picked up and dropped by the others at will? In either role, he was a perfect character to depict the Commercial Committee as a social club, ruled by vanity and esteem rather than power. He had been patronized by the others; his place in the Vorstand fell to him largely because of his former connection with Greisheim Elektron, and his income was much less than that of the others. This was another odd-job for the Baron, and probably to Haeffliger the final tragedy of a frustrating career. He was the member who "heard," who "was present," listening bitterly to the subdued counterpoint of their ambitions - yes, his pitifully subjective approach might weaken the hard facts of the matter.

The members called the Committee "our circle." von Schnitzler referred ^{repeatedly} to their discussions as "purely economic." Yet at the first Berlin meeting, there was talk of "the problems which have accumulated under the Four Year Plan and Rearmament." All Farben agencies, said Haeffliger's report, must stay in touch with Ilgner's Political Economy Department "with regard to negotiations with authorities, so as to assure a uniform attitude of the I.G. towards all these questions." And at this meeting plans were made to include representatives of the oldest, largest explosives firm on the Continent - - Dynamit Nobel A.G. "Paul Mueller, Chairman of DAG," von Schnitzler announced, would be
