④ BUT this was not significant, really-- 'Four Year Plan' and 'Five Year Plan' were common expressions of the time....Russia had desired a close collaboration with I. G. Farben's expansion of the Russian Chemical Industry. The Russians sent a commission in the year 1934 to Germany. I knew the Russians somewhat from before, from negotiations in the nitrogen and dyestuffs fields. In the field of hydrogenation also, members of the Russian Trade Delegation came to me at Oppau (near Ludwigshafen). Then, particularly for the working out of new projects, I dealt with them; for, according to the contracts, the approval and the technical working-out of projects was up to us.

⑤ There were various visits to Berlin to see the Russian Trade Delegation. I suggested to Russia that they visit certain plants to aid them in the study of the Russian Oil Industry, but then the German Government made difficulties. The members of the Russian Trade Delegation with whom I had gladly negotiated, were suddenly called away from Berlin. I noticed that especially, because on the next day, I was invited to visit these men, and one hour beforehand, I was informed that they had left for Moscow. That was the end of the negotiations with Russia.

⑥ They were resumed only after the agreement of Hitler with Russia in 1939, which resulted in an economic agreement with Russia. Then the men of Russian Oil industry appeared in Germany, and I again had to negotiate with them about new gasoline processes, analytical processes, and so forth.

Indeed, it was Professor Krauch's interest in international cooperation that had led him to Berlin Northwest 7. He had set up his office there when he began discussions with Schacht in 1929. If Farben synthetic gasoline and oil were to find a market in Germany, the Government would have to levy duties on imported fuels.
