

scapegoat for the others. He lectured to them on the various skilled jobs in a chemical factory. A chemical worker could not make minute measurements with a policeman standing over him, rubber truncheon in hand. While with the Government, he realized that the S.S. and, later, the Sauckel office, knew nothing about human engineering, and that if the production-quotas for the chemical industry were to be met, his office would have to take over the job of getting specialized workers. Germany had always been short of workers, and the new quotas made the shortage crucial. During peacetime, many foreigners earned their living in Germany - - such as the so-called "Eastern migrants" from Poland who worked on German farms. Why couldn't the chemical industry (almost entirely Farben) procure its own workers, during the war? Farben could offer clean work for better pay. Vaguely, he had the idea also of solving "human misery" by drafting some unskilled labor, bringing them to the Farben plants, where they could raise their status by learning chemical skills.

They did not doubt this explanation. After all, he treated them as lawyers first, and soldiers second. One of them was a Jew and the Professor had saved several Jewish lives. During the occupation of Holland, his influence had rescued the Jewish wife of a Professor-Doctor from the Nazi troops; he had arranged to send several Jewish scientists from Farben abroad in exchange for Aryans, and had saved one half-Jewish boy from the Gestapo. In fact, his own home had been searched once from top to bottom, by the local Gestapo. ~~Infantry, this was~~ He'd set them straight by raising hell with their superiors, and he was not disturbed again; which suggested that his was a powerful office. Yet, if he could get away with recruiting workers, in violation of the law and defiance of the S.S., more power to him!

It was not ideal, of course; there was a war going on; but his own representatives and the Farben men had accompanied the transports
