

been the only Plenipotentiary who did not have plenipotentiary powers. He had been only a "consultative expert."

That made sense. A few big businessmen had been appointed to high positions under Roosevelt, only to discover they had little power.

At first, they had no intention of arresting him. But they were still looking for others, and he helped. They were mildly surprised when his authority proved enough to round them up. Still, they thought of him as a man of "connections."

"Gajewski?" he said (not "Doctor Gajewski"). "Give me a couple of days and I'll have him here." "Ernst Buergin?" He was the light-metals man. "I'll get him for you."

For many months while the others were in jail, the Professor worked unmolested in his library. Then the other suspects pulled his empty chair into the Boardroom. Questions concerning Farben production they referred to "The Four Year Plan." But what office of the Four Year Plan directed their production? - - "G. B. Chem," which was Professor Carl Krauch.

At that time, the most startling information against them, (though it was incomplete), concerned the Farben agents who had traveled all over Europe to get labor during the war. There was evidence that Fritz Sauckel, when assigned in March 1942 to direct the new Nazi program of getting foreign workers, was surprised to discover that I. G. Farben had since 1939 been "wildly recruiting foreign labor." Again, the other directors pointed the finger at Krauch's office, the "G.B. Chem," which was "the highest authority for passing on allocations of labor in the chemical industry." The Farben agents had been selected, ~~trained~~ trained and assigned to various countries by Krauch.

The investigators continued to call on the Professor. More than his "American" behavior convinced them on these occasions that he was a
