

tossed out but all of them could be shifted around. But no matter how they were shifted, the compartments were partitioned from each other. Each successive arrangement was orderly, with an appealing arrangement. How had they carried themselves so consistently well? Was it the phenomenon of group-innocence acting its part sincerely? Maybe. All of them so far, even Paul Haeffliger, were men who had gained scientific knowledge ^{by} through varying disciplines: Hoerlein by a natural predisposition to shut ~~him~~ himself in; Ambros by curbing his impulsiveness. ~~But~~ The other technical men had been stabilized, too, by a unity that grew after The trial began. ~~I~~ ^I believed that this near-miracle was possible for those

special reasons. (NOTE BY ED: In JAIL SCENE HERETOFORE, CUT REF. TO T/M LEADING DEFENSE)

Obviously, one of them was planning and directing the Defense for all. ^{TP} Also, the defendants had been permitted frequent social contact with each other, a privilege ~~so~~ ^{Co-7} defendants did not usually enjoy; ~~in fact~~ they had been holding regular Vorstand meetings during which they maintained the delusion ~~and~~ ^{for} expectation that soon they would go back to their offices. Then, too, they personally were not on the scenes of most of the heinous crimes they were accused of. It must have been easier for ~~them~~ the technical men, highly individualistic anyway, to turn from accusations concerning multiple sufferings than to have turned from a single corpse, the single case of an accusing witness who might have seen them on the spot. They suffered, ~~but~~ but their suffering made little change in them on the witness stand.

Then Max Ilgner took the stand. We ~~had~~ ^{supposed, expected} believed that his arrogance would strike the
