

to power. Buna and Irga could not yet make money in the markets of America and Asia, nor could it show a profit anywhere in European markets without political subsidy.

Max Ilgner did not have the same qualms as ter Meer about letting the government in on the deal. He believed that the government trade which would come from "Limited Autarchy" and ^{from} the Farben ~~trade in~~ ^{-TRADE} exports could be kept in reasonable balance. For the government, Farben could produce many things synthetically. As for the things Germany lacked, Farben's shrewd trading abroad would net the foreign ^{EXCHANGE} money to buy them. It was a half-Socialist idea, but so long as Farben held on to all its secrets, even those which worked for the Government, Germany would prosper. This philosophy, said Ilgner, was "the natural counterbalance against radical ~~business~~ tendencies to acquire raw materials by force." If Germany had a "sound export" - - that is, controlled mainly by Farben - - the rest of the world would prosper, too.

In his gimlet eyes was a sadness the color of gunmetal...no, that was reading into him the other Ilgner. You would not expect him to give up his Doctorate for the sake of a sociable defense, but, hearing him now for the first time, you'd feel ~~the~~ new humility. He deferred to the ^{PRESIDENT} ~~Chair~~ in a kind of pathetic caricature of ter Meer. ~~Something had changed him.~~ Where was the Ilgner who had been by turns too servile and too belligerent? He had spoken well. Now he whined a little, quickly moderated his tone, with restraint. "They" had denied him a chance to write everything he needed to say; he was afraid to make more statements, after "they" had challenged his word. Yet he had turned in three hundred affidavits. It was ^{SOME TIME} ~~a few weeks~~ since the Prosecution had stopped interrogating him, ^{and} It was clear that he had actually missed being
