

tribunal most unfavorably, ^{But} he was not the Ilgner of eight months before.

Bella in interview with him

We should have foreseen the change in him, I suppose. But after ~~that day~~ in the jail, I had looked on him as an odious, unchangeable egocentric. He had written many statements since then, all in his own hand--sometimes "correcting" a statement by writing it almost exactly as he had before. But this habit was not new. Several of his Berlin Northwest 7 employees, who had been persuaded rather easily to testify, had depicted him as a selfish employer who had made more notes, more speeches, kept more records and talked more, than anyone they had ever known. When in 1945 his colleagues had sent a director to Heidelberg to check on Hermann Schmitz' hidden activities, they hadn't thought to have Hermann's most intimate nephew investigated, too. It would have been distasteful to them if ^{Ilgner} ~~Max~~ had informed on Schmitz, and as far as his own activities were concerned, suspicion had not yet fallen on Berlin Northwest 7, and they had nothing but personal reasons, apparently, to dislike him. Even now, with the expansions in Berlin Northwest 7 having been repeated in chronological form, ~~it did not occur~~ ^{IT DID NOT OCCUR TO THE PROSECUTION THAT} ~~some of the~~ ^{Some thought} the moving of the VW to another building in the Northwest 7 Zone cast much new light on the character of ~~Max~~ ^{Some thought} Ilgner. ~~It had been said~~ that lack of space forced the move, and though the Commercial Committee and other offices had moved in after the VW moved out, we believed that this merely confirmed that the technical mens' distaste for Ilgner had been a factor in the VW's exit. A distaste so flat that no one thought to wonder whether Ilgner had gone abroad so often partly to find people who liked him better.
