

defendant! Whether he is innocent or guilty, the shame of being suspected may blush on his face like a confession! In some men, after sleepless hours of confinement where miles of pacing cannot relieve the mind as much as would two steps in the sun, it takes as much courage to tell the truth as it does to lie. ~~But~~ ^{Many} a felon, otherwise cowardly, has developed that courage, without chaplain, to an almost automatic efficiency, while some find the courage ~~only~~ only by making a last true bargain with their souls - - just get them out of this, Lord, and they'll never sin again! The lies that come from such subjective bargains are hardest to detect.

~~But~~ ^{the} whatever spiritual process ^{that} goes on in the defendant, his having to prepare to take the witness-stand is a Sentence. If he is innocent, he must not only try to confine most of his testimony to a small, horrible-seeming sequence of events, but even try to ~~forget~~ ^{conceal} some of the ^{True} facts which his lawyer feels might make the jury think he's lying.

~~as if~~ ^{IP} If he is guilty, he must filter in the false facts with a ^{good deal of} truth. Under ~~the scrutiny of this harshest judge~~ the scrutiny of this harshest judge, ~~Plausibility~~ ^{and truth} Plausibility, ~~the truth~~ falsehood lie so perilously close together for both innocent and guilty that the innocent man released feels a bitterness quite like the man who is punished. Psychologically, ^{speaking,} every man who ever stood trial should go free.

But in this trial the Defense ~~had~~ ^{had} so far been a remarkable exception to the ~~trial~~ trial-experiences of all of us. ^{Those defendants} The man who had taken the stand had behaved according to an undeviating plan. ~~There was a pigeonhole desk in which none of the compartments could be~~
