

after George Sylvester Viereck, the ~~Nazi-Nazi~~ Nazi's most notorious propagandist in the United States, had denounced him as a "friend of the Bolsheviks." ^{TP} Even as he was dying, Lee protested his innocence on both counts. He was particularly interested in Russia. But his interest was of a general and platonic nature."

Ilgner's eyes watered. The memory of those talks at Baden-Baden still ~~disturbed~~ disturbed him. On the surface, he and Lee were partners in persuading thousands of American businessmen that the Hitler Government kept its hands off industry better than FDR did in the United States. Ilgner was not a Nazi then, nor was Lee. And how could Lee be a Communist after ^{explaining} ~~himself~~ explaining the rise of Hitler by charging that "Communists and Marxists," among other things, had led to the abyss. No, they were ^{just} businessmen who did not believe that parliamentary government was good for business; someone had to lead, maybe not a Hitler, a Mussolini or a Stalin, but someone. Lee had been "interested" in Russia, and while he did not approve of the Government taking over industries, he thought there was much good in the firm way in which the Soviet Government had directed the economy. "And in the United States, one ^{was} ~~is~~ interested in a number of things. For example, is Germany going to become an autarchy?"

"Is Germany Heading for Self-Sufficiency?" was one question Lee had proposed for a series of articles to be written by Schacht, Schmitz, Ilgner and others. The articles purported
