

Lee's words characterizing the beginning of the Nazi regime had the eloquent ring of a historian's benediction written many years too soon. This was the moment for Ilgner to flare up, to fling down the less temperate publicity releases piled high on his lap. But his stubby fingers, like a worm wriggling on a ~~hook~~, had been scribbling invisible declarations on the sub-committee's report, and then the red embarrassment left his face.

"The Carl Schurz Association had been founded in 1927 by democratic circles in Southern Germany. Carl Schurz was the most significant German who fled to the United States in 1848. He became a General in the Civil War. He was a friend of Abe Lincoln, and he was famous for his laws for the protection of negroes after the abolition of slavery in the United States."

Tensely, he went on describing how the Association had intended only to follow ~~Lee's~~ Lee's advice. ^{"Lee told us?"} ~~He said,~~ "Try to prevent any propaganda in the United States, but see to it that the American public is better informed by fair publicity."

Ilgner had no bad words for Lee, though he was now dead and beyond cross-examination. A strangely sacrificial loyalty in a man who had readily implicated his own ~~brother~~ brother! Although Lee and Ilgner had spent perhaps no more than a hundred hours together, there was no ^{doubt} ~~doubt~~ that Lee's influence had stirred some tortuous ideological cross-currents in Ilgner's mind. After the first sub-committee interrogations, Lee had taken ill and returned to Germany, hoping to recover at the sanatorium at Baden-Baden. He was pretty sick at heart, too. Not only had he been investigated for allegedly pro-German sympathies, but he had been grilled ~~over~~
