Peter Hoaglund Before the war, Hoaglund was in charge of General Motors' largest auto plants in Germany, the Opal Works. He is a close friend of James Mooney of GM, who in 1941 wrote a series of articles claiming that Hitler had no evil intentions towards the U.S. Hoaglund worked very closely with Draper and Wysor on the Hoover report.

Graeme Howard One of the first GM officials who began planning against our Allied policy in Germany. While in the Army, as a colonel, he fought vigorously against the adoption of JCS 1067. Before the war, he praised the totalitarian practice of the Axis. He justified German aggression. He was one of the outspoken apologists for the Munich appeasement policy. He was in favor of a negotiated peace during the war, and he was against the unconditional surrender policy of Roosevelt. While in the army, he was one of the most pernicious influences actively working against the U.S. post-war policy towards Germany.

Calvin Hoover Dean of Duke University. He was originally selected by the War Department to head the Intelligence Group for AMG and to be special adviser to General Draper. Since 1944 he was against the Morgenthau Plan. He called it a Carthaginian Plan. He was the so-called author of the Calvin Hoover report of September 1945, which sought to destroy the economic provisions of the control over Germany. His ideas were those of Wysor, Hoaglund and Howard.
