LIST OF AMERICANS WHO WERE INSTRUMENTAL IN SCUTTILING THE ALLIED POLICY TOWARDS GERMANY
Edward P. Zuchek Also ex-ambassador to the United States, formerly General Motors representative in Belgium.

P. P. Glover Chief of Oil Section of the Fuel and Mining Branch of USOC.
William H. Draper, Jr. Vice-President of Dillon Read. On leave with the Army.

In 1926, his firm made a loan of 125 million dollars to consolidate and establish the biggest steel works in Germany, the Vereinigte Stahlwerke. Immediately after the downfall of Germany, he was placed in charge of economic affairs of the U.S. Zone. More than any other official, he was instrumental in nullifying the economic safeguards against German aggression.

During the investigation of the Vereinigte Stahlwerke, letters written before the war by Draper were found in the director's files, showing his close ties with the biggest steel works in Europe.

D. C. Humphrey Deputy Director of the Economic Division of AMG. Formerly with Duke University. He was the main author of the Calvin Hoover report on post-war German economy, Sept. 1945, in which he sought to prove that the economic revisions of the Potsdam Agreement were unsound. In this report Humphrey, without scientific foundation, sought to prove that Germany must have ten million tons of steel capacity per year. He was the first to raise the cry of saving the taxpayers money.

On August 15, 1945, he issued a secret directive to all sections of the Economic Division telling them to disregard the Potsdam Agreement, and to see to it that the coal produced in Germany remains there, in order to rebuild the German heavy industry at the expense of Germany's victims.

Howard C. Peterson Until recently, Peterson was Assistant Secretary of War in charge of occupied territories. Prior to joining the War Department, he was a member of the Cravath Whitney legal firm, specializing in I. G. Farben affairs. Peterson did yeoman work to frustrate the Potsdam Agreement, especially the provisos dealing with decartelization, deindustrialization and reparations.

John J. McCloy Prior to becoming head of the International Bank, McCloy was Assistant Secretary of War, in charge of occupied territories. McCloy was formerly connected with the firm of Cravath Whitney, representing I. G. Farben in the U.S. He was completely out of sympathy with the Potsdam Agreement. McCloy was appointed to the International Bank with the help of his friend, Winthrop Aldrich, of the Chase National Bank, and his Wall St. friends.

Rufus J. Wysor Former president of Republic Steel. Also connected with Jones & Laughlin Steel Co., and the Bethlehem Steel Co. He was selected by the War Dept. to supervise metallurgical operations in Germany and to control the removals and the dismantling of German steel mills. While in Germany, instead of dismantling the steel mills for reparations, Wysor saw to it that the program of reparations be completely emasculated on the theory that Germany needed ten million tons of steel per year. He vigorously opposed the FEA analysis of steel needs. He worked very closely with Humphrey on the Calvin Hoover report, and was responsible for its main thesis, namely, that Germany could not live by increasing her agriculture and by exporting the product of light industry.
