

Text of Hitler Address Marking the 11th Anniversary of His National Socialist Regime

LONDON, Jan. 30 (U.P.)—The text of the speech by Adolf Hitler as broadcast by the German radio and recorded and translated by The United Press:

In the fifth year of this the greatest of wars, the causes and the sense and purpose of this world struggle cannot any longer be unclear to anyone. For the time in which it could still seem that this struggle was one of European conflicts, instigated again and again by Britain to render the Continent powerless and to maintain the balance of power in favor of the British Empire, is long past.

Those who since 1936 in London dealt in systematic war mongering have now become not the leaders but those who are led. The spirits they hoped to use, according to the old British custom, have once more become the masters themselves and are too powerful for them. No matter how this struggle may end, Britain, finally and irrevocably, has lost her role in the Continent.

The eyes of the world will be opened about the importance of the Jewish question quite independently of the result of this struggle. Millions of war prisoners will become propagandists about this. The question no longer is whether it is possible to say who will have hegemony at the end of this struggle, either the European family of nations represented by the strongest state among it or the Bolshevik Colossus. Either Germany will be victorious on behalf of the whole of Europe or Soviet Russia will be the victor.

Statements spread abroad by some British newspapers to the effect that Russia, after beating Germany eventually, would no longer have any reason to penetrate further into Europe and would be satisfied with education—that is to say, extermination—of the German people, are nothing but Jewish falsehoods. The same applies to insinuations that Britain would then immediately take the lead in a new fight against Soviet Russia.

England's Chances "Hopeless"

The victor in this struggle certainly will not let British newspaper writers determine his aims in this war. Secondly, in the event bolshevism is finally victorious, the sorry remains of Europe will hardly be ready to continue the struggle against the European-Asiatic Soviet colossus under England's leadership. Even less so, as England's military chances in such a struggle must be considered hopeless.

Furthermore, every European knows that at best this small surviving remnant of Europe would receive only the honor—like the Canadian, Australian and South African troops—to carry on their own bloody burden in the struggle for the maintenance of British domination and to save British manpower and lives.

One thing, therefore, is quite certain: in this struggle there can be only one victor, and that will be either Germany or Soviet Russia. German victory means the preservation of Europe and a victory by Soviet Russia means its destruction. That is so clear that even every Englishman who is not completely pig-headed should know it.

If with real British hypocrisy they pretend the outcome might after all be different, that is only because of the fact that the guilty war criminals in London no longer see the possibility of disentangling themselves from the entanglements of their own creation.

The way back is already blocked to them by their Jewish wire-pullers and instigators in respect to their internal policy, too. For Britain, as well as the United States, the question no longer exists as to whether after this war they want to fight bolshevism. But the question is only whether after this war they will be able to resist bolshevism at home.

What in the practical sense Europe may expect of British war promises is most clearly shown by the British and American attitude toward the fate of the Poles, Finns, Baltic States and the whole of southeast Europe.

States Were "Sacrificed"

By the unscrupulous promises of guarantees to help Poland, that State was driven into war against Germany. By the blatant lie that other States must be saved from Germany, they were compelled to accept treaties of assistance, and with the same lying phrases one after the other of these countries has been dropped. They had to be sacrificed, not because the individual Englishman wanted it, but because England in case of a bolshevist victory would be unable to prevent this outcome.

Not only are they—in view of their own position, which is entirely contaminated by bolshevism—unable to conduct successfully any other policy, but also every state that, like England, has sold its soul to Judaism will sooner or later succumb to this pest unless at the last minute it pulls itself together to expel these bacteria by force from its body.

The opinion that it would be possible to live together peaceably and even to live in harmony with these ferments of decomposition is nothing but the belief that the body in time will reach a state in which it will assimilate cholera bacillus.

The question of the salvation of Europe and the European states is one, therefore, that cannot be solved exclusively by the National Socialist German people and its army. If, however, the Reich is crushed, no other state in Europe could put up resistance to this new invasion of Huns. They know this quite well in the Kremlin.

Therefore, out of sheer precaution for the future, the Kremlin would in case of victory decide on the complete extermination of the German people. This aim is also the openly admitted intention of international Jewry. It is quite irrelevant in this connection whether Jewish advocates of this aim are in England or in America or elsewhere in the various countries of Europe, or whether they are directing from their central office in Moscow.

It is also quite irrelevant whether European or non-European statesmen are ready to admit this fact or not, or whether in one country or another people believe it is possible to decontaminate themselves from the bacteria they had grown themselves by their servile attitude.

Sees Long Culture Destroyed

Unless Germany is victorious, the fate of these States in northern, southern and central Europe will be determined within a few months. Ten years later the oldest cultural Continent would have lost its essential traits of individuality. Gone would be the picture so beloved by all of us, of the cultural and material development existing for more than 2,500 years.

The bearers of this culture, the leaders of nations, would perish somewhere in the woods and swamps of Siberia, if they were not finished off before by being shot in the neck.

Jewry could then celebrate the destruction of Europe by a second triumphant Purim festival. [The Purim festival marks the deliverance of the Jews from Haman.] That the German people today are capable of conducting this decisive struggle for life and death for their own preservation and for the preservation of the European Continent is due to the grace of God, who, after its long struggle for power—now eleven years old—has let National Socialism victoriously achieve its aim.

Without Jan. 30, 1933, and without the National Socialist revolution, without its gigantic internal work of purification and construction, there would be no power in Europe today capable of opposing the bolshevist colossus. The Germany of that time was so weakened by the growing Jewish infection that it could hardly think of mastering the Bolshevist danger in the interior. Even less could it oppose it abroad.

As in other countries, economic ruins were brought about by Jewry, rendering unemployed several million Germans. The destruction of the peasantry, trade and industry were planned in preparation for an interior collapse. This was furthered by the maintenance of a senseless class society that helped turn into hate the reason of the masses in order to convert them into a willing instrument of bolshevism.

Helpless Weimar State Seen

By mobilizing these proletarian slaves it was hoped that after the annihilation of their national intelligence they could be still more degraded into complete coolies. But even if this process of bolshevist revolt did not reach full success inside Germany, the German state with its Weimar constitution would, in the face of the great tasks of modern world policy, only have been a ridiculous and helpless body.

To be prepared for this conflict, not only problems of power but mostly problems of a social and economic character had to be solved.

When National Socialism eleven years ago without delay started realizing its program, it succeeded just in the nick of time in setting up a state that had enough strength in its external relations to fulfill that European mission which in ancient times Greece had against the Persians, Rome against the Carthaginians, and, in later centuries, the Western World against Eastern tribes.

In addition to many others, four great tasks therefore confronted us in 1933. On their solution depended not only the future of the Reich but also the salvation of Europe, perhaps even that of all human civilization.

First: By solving its inner social problems Germany had to find again the social peace it had lost at home. This meant that the elements that split up the nation into classes, the bourgeoisie and the proletariat, had to be abolished in their many forms and
