No reliance can be placed upon prospects of inducing the Arabs of Palestine to leave the country to the Jews and migrate voluntarily to the underpopulated areas of Transjordan, Syria and Iraq. Only the most lavish compensation could induce any substantial number of Arabs to go to countries with a lower standard of living, of which they have no direct knowledge, and for which they have no attachments.

Prospects of partitioning Palestine are little more promising than those of evacuating a substantial part of the Arabs from the country. The frontiers of Palestine, Transjordan, and the Lebanon are already seriously constricting from the point of view of rational use of water resources. A smaller territorial unit would place even more severe barriers in the way of progressive economic development. Moreover the Arab and Jewish populations are not distributed in such a manner as to facilitate territorial partition. Every Jew or Arab who expresses himself in favor of partition unfailingly suggests a division which would give his own national group almost all of the country, reserving a few scraps for the other national group.

Peace in Palestine cannot be foreseen realistically except in terms of greater success of Arabs and Jews in living together and working together. Under the best of circumstances, general close collaboration cannot be anticipated in the near future. For short-term purposes, it is necessary to plan in terms of two markets and two labor forces, with a certain amount of "international" trade and migration. Joint projects of agricultural intensification and modernization seem to be the most promising area for immediate close cooperation. Arabs might also fruitfully be employed on Jewish construction, at Jewish wages.

Collaboration of Jews and Arabs in the development of Palestine can be conceived only within the framework of a basic political program backed by all the moral and material authority of the United Nations. That basic program needs to be enunciated soon and maintained firmly despite conflicting purposes and the assaults of terrorism. Prolonged open conflict, such as existed in 1936-37,
